Mismatched Influenza A Viruses Infect ICR Mouse Mice Expressing Different H-2 Loci. Host genetic differences in the outcome of infection may be associated with pathogen-specific immunity and with the dominance of resistant or susceptible host strains. Here, we compared the infection of naive ICR mice expressing different H-2 loci with human influenza A viruses to test whether these viruses exhibit different immunopathogenic potential in their natural host strain. ICR mice expressing different H-2 haplotypes were infected intranasally with human H3N2 and H1N1 viruses. To facilitate the identification of the mouse strains that exhibit the most prominent immune responses, the experimental conditions were modified from classical in vivo infection models, which typically induce mild signs of disease in these mouse strains. Consequently, ICR mice expressing different H-2 haplotypes developed a more severe disease state than B6 mice after infection with human H3N2 influenza viruses. B6 mice, irrespective of the H-2 haplotype, showed increased virus replication, which correlated with a more pronounced infiltration of monocytes/macrophages. In contrast, ICR mice expressing different H-2 haplotypes showed a distinct pattern of virus replication but also of monocyte/macrophage infiltration that was strikingly different from that seen in B6 mice. These results suggest that the induction of immune responses to influenza A viruses in ICR mice is influenced by H-2 loci, and that the contribution of individual H-2 haplotypes on disease pathogenesis differs for human and murine influenza A viruses. The findings also illustrate that influenza A viruses are capable of infecting mice of different H-2 loci and that the experimental design may facilitate the identification of mouse strains that display a distinct susceptibility to human influenza viruses.

Adopt Our Pets Adoption Many people who want to adopt a dog already own a dog. According to the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the average number of dogs and cats in a household is two. What you need to know All dogs and cats over six weeks of age are spayed or neutered. Before you adopt, consider the availability of your choice. You may think you want a particular breed, but if it isn't available, you may be disappointed. You may think you want a particular breed, but if it isn't available, you may be disappointed.
